

From: Bill Rodgers
To: Microsoft ATR
Date: 1/25/02 1:07am
Subject: Microsoft Settlement

I find the behaviour of AOL appauling. It seems that AOL are more intent to be seen as a successful court litigator than as a company that would provide quality software to the public. They can't compete with expertise and quality products so they seem to want to "knock" the industry standard down to their own level. This will do nothing for the advancement of technology and the benefits that can have to consumers. It is time AOL were given a clear message that they either start to get their software development act together and contribute to the development of users computing experience or they get out of the game.

Bill Rodgers

Newcastle, Australia